of the World report had [REDACTED]

Darius was incredibly incensed, and rang me up and asked me if I would go and "see" the reporter. There were one or two phone calls about this and I agreed to go. I think really that the phonecalls were Darius' idea of releasing tension. Occasionally, I have been employed to threaten physical violence against people, but only when they have been engaged in something very nasty indeed. For example someone might contact me and say that his sixteen year old daughter was living with a man twice ~~their~~ ^{her} age. I might go around and make it clear to the man that he should leave the girl alone. I have to admit that if he didn't agree, I might assault him. If the man threatened violence back, I would warn him that next time he would have others besides me to contend with, so therefore that would do him no good. It was really a form of persuasion, and physical violence was to be avoided if possible.

I would explain further, later in this statement, my experience with violence and the threat of violence dating from a very early age.
